

Rupert Reports...

It's been a relatively quiet term for me; things have been much more like normal at school. I have spent time in a range of A level lessons; I do find a double lesson a bit long so have tended to maraud between Geography, Psychology, Sociology and Mr Fennell's office as the mood takes me. The Year 13 Geographers are in the middle of an important piece of coursework so I have supported them in the computer room as they analyse their data and carry out a range of statistical techniques. Year 12 EPQ students are now at the stage of finalising the issue they wish to research and are starting the time-consuming process of shifting through all the material out there to find the best quality information to write up their report. I have also helped out with a group on a Wednesday afternoon this term (see image below), have continued working with Year 7 in some literacy lessons and sat in on a number of student annual reviews with Mrs Bennett, our SENCO.

I spent part of half term in Sidmouth. The demographic of this town is towards the upper end of the age range. Ms Skeplorn was still on crutches at this point but felt quite youthful and mobile compared with many of the local residents. The excellent news is we have the all clear from the consultant for longer walks (as long as the surface is even and sensible footwear is worn). We are therefore heading back to Cornwall for New Year as usual - is this wise I hear you ask? We promise to be VERY careful but at least the local vet and hospital now have all our details - what could possibly go wrong?

Happy Holidays everyone!
