

Reader

- You will be in a smaller room, not the main exam hall.
- There will be a TA who will read whatever you ask them to, but you must ask them exactly what you want read.
- You might have a computer reader, or reader pen if you normally use one.

A reader can:

- Read whole or part questions
- Read back your own work
- Read questions more than once
- Spell out the word if it is written in a question in the paper.

You can:

- Underline/highlight any key words within the question.

A reader cannot:

- Explain the meaning of words, or what the question is asking, or help you choose which question to do.
- For the English Language exam and MFL, a reader cannot read any of the question paper to you as this is what is being tested. However, for these papers you could use a computer reader or reading pen as this is not a human – you will still be independent, but you must have practised this and be using it in class - the reader can read back anything that you have written.
- In maths exams the reader cannot read the symbols (e.g. $\times$, $+$, $-$) or abbreviations (e.g. kg or cm). Sometimes the digits or the words cannot be read - for example, the question may read 'write 3541 in words' or 'write two hundred and forty one in digits'. Reading them would give the answer away so they cannot be read.
- If you use a reading pen, you can sit in the main hall with earphones on.
